Testing for international arrivals could start in June

No later than 15 June 2020, travelers are expected to be given a choice between a two-week quarantine or being tested for the virus upon arrival, or otherwise proving that they are free of corona virus infection. Exact requirements are still being developed but travelers will likely be required to download and use the official tracing app already in use by 40% of the population in Iceland. The app has been developed following the strictest privacy standards, with location data stored locally on the user's device unless released for tracing purposes in case of an infection.

A few important things for you to have in mind while traveling in Iceland:

- If you are traveling from abroad and have cold-like symptoms should contact the Health line +354 544
